Some Help With

How to Overcome the 100-Second Waiting Period with AnyDesk Student Licenses

In the AnyDesk community, we've received numerous inquiries regarding the use of student licenses and whitelists, especially concerning the 100-second connection waiting period. We understand that this is a valid concern, particularly for graduate students who have changed their academic status, such as those transitioning from undergraduate to master's programs.

Student licenses and the associated whitelist you previously utilized come with a specific validity period. Typically, these terms are tied to the academic course duration, which could explain the reappearance of the 100-second waiting period after a year of uninterrupted use.

If you are encountering this waiting period again, don't worry. It's possible to register anew for a student license, which will allow you to eliminate the waiting time on your connections once more. We recommend checking the email address you used for your previous registration, as you may have received instructions on how to renew or access your license.

If you don't recall the exact steps you took to eliminate the waiting time, feel free to visit the AnyDesk support page, where you'll find a step-by-step guide to complete the registration process for your new student license.

We appreciate your understanding and are here to help you enjoy uninterrupted access to AnyDesk, making your work and studies more efficient.

 © 2026 www.somehelpwith.com