Some Help With

How to Whitelist Your AnyDesk Account for Personal Use and Avoid Notifications

If you're using AnyDesk to access your media PC at home or to assist family members, you may have noticed that you're recently receiving notifications limiting your use of the application. This can be frustrating, especially when all you want to do is enjoy your media content or provide technical support to your loved ones.

Whitelisting functionality is a process that AnyDesk implements to identify users who are utilizing the software for professional purposes. If you've received a message indicating that you might be using AnyDesk for work, but you only use it for personal reasons, there are still ways to address this issue.

To continue using AnyDesk for free, you should submit a request to be whitelisted. There are specific instructions available on their portal to assist users in completing this process. You'll simply need to follow the link provided in the pop-up message you receive to submit your request, clarifying that your use of AnyDesk is personal, not professional.

Remember that as a personal user, your access to AnyDesk should remain free once your request is approved. While the Whitelisting functionality continues to exist, you shouldn't seek alternatives just yet unless this solution fails to resolve your issue.

If you continue to experience difficulties or do not receive a response after your request, we recommend maintaining communication with AnyDesk support for ongoing assistance. The company greatly values user experience and is willing to help resolve any challenges you face.

We hope this information helps you resolve your issues with AnyDesk and that you can soon enjoy your media PC sessions without interruptions. Good luck!